During the 10 years which have passed since the law was enacted, the old charges of an "Alaska Siberia" have cropped up from time to time throughout the country. Now the canard is repeated in the daily issue of the Seattle Times. I have written to the editor and ask unanimous consent that my letter be made part of the Record at this point.

The letter was ordered to be printed in the Record as follows:

EDITOR, COMMON SENSE,
UNION, N.J.

DEAR SIR: I am surprised and shocked that Common Sense still hangs on the charge that a million acres of Alaska land is being held ready for internment of political 'offenders.'

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed after Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.

The Alaska Mental Health Act was passed before Alaska became a state. The million acre grant was made to help the Territory of Alaska finance a mental health program from the proceeds of the disposition of that land. The law was reenacted in 1961. Since that event and the Congress of the United States have been generous and helpful to the Territory of Alaska, in the sense of providing certain lands for continued use as a mental hospital and for other mental facilities. The act was designed to establish concentration camps for political opponents, under the guise of care and treatment of the mentally ill.

The preposterous allegation was first made by a California newspaper when the publication of the 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 544,453 acres was announced by the Department of Interior. It was repeated by the New York Times when the publication of 946,220 acres out of the million acre grant was announced by the Department of Interior.